Aren't tennis skirts the best?

Despite the title, this article isn't really about nepotism so much as it's about deeper things that I can't put into words otherwise. Perhaps a better topic would be resentment or worldview consistency. Regardless, my substack posts mainly serve the purposes of journaling my thoughts & exercising my writing abilities. I've gotten into the habit of using minor issues I encounter to introduce the point of my articles, and I think it's worked well by both guiding my writing & grounding some of my more overarching points in simple reality. There's probably a name for this system for those more knowledgeable on literature, but whatever.

Nepotism probably doesn't need an introduction. It's ultimately just applied favoritism, usually within the family but also includes friends or other more abstract relationships. Nepotism is one of those things that is just taken as bad in most discourse, usually not attacked or defended. The term itself simply carries negative connotations, and is often used as an insult in the form of "Nepobaby."

You see it all the time online. Someone complaining about a coworker or supervisor & claiming they only got to their position by nepotism, insinuating that they would otherwise never get that position 'fairly' & lack the skills to 'earn it.'

It's an easy thing to get angry about, the boss's son just got out of college & now gets a high paying supervisor position while you're still on the assembly line despite working at the company for a decade. Woe is me!

The moralizing about nepotism & fairness at large generally disappears when one gets into the position to make those decisions. Most people will complain about it, but would absolutely give their own children a helping hand if given the opportunity. College funds, guaranteed employment, whatever form it takes. A key purpose to parenthood is the notion of wanting your kids to have better lives than yourself, regardless of any rambling about 'privilege.'

Which leads me to my first point, the moralizing behind nepotism is ultimately the same line of thinking of White privilege. Just as White privilege is justified because my ancestors were better than Juan's, nepotism is justified because my father was better than John's. Any argument against nepotism is inherently feeding into the same sort of critical theory that justifies anti-White sentiment, among similar things.

Which leads me to my next point, resentment. It's pretty easy to fall into resentment, especially given the current state of the West, but it's also pretty stupid. Resentment is arguably a foundational pillar of leftist ideology & thus holds no place in RW thought.

Despite that, we see it everywhere. People attacking feminism not due to philosophical or practical reasons but out of resentment towards women. Antisemitism not based on the certain racial characteristics Jews have, but out of resentment that they're in charge. I could go on.

Polk recently wrote an article, in it he brought up how he makes sure that the people who generally share his opinions often have them for the wrong reasons. This is important, because having the wrong reasons will lead to the wrong conclusions even if a broken clock is right twice a day.

Resentment is arguably the worst trait someone can have, Nietzsche wrote about it extensively when it takes the form of resentment. It's something that usually comes from less favorable individuals.

A good example is an iFunny user by the name of Feti, who I generally never interacted with much but was forced to witness by way of my muties repubbing his stuff. Daklr posted this article giving his thoughts on the situation.

Unlike Daklr, I do not have sympathy for Feti, the whole situation did nothing but make me think "wow what a fucking loser." More importantly, we have to take into account how him being a loser affects his opinions. How much of his anti-feminism was rooted in his inability to ask out his crush for 8 years? How much of his distaste for pajeets is based on the one dating his crush? There are very valid empirical & philosophical arguments behind both of those things, but he didn't come to these thoughts by way of reason. He came from resentment because he's a fucking loser.

I take care to make sure I avoid thinking things for the wrong reasons. Am I really against homosexuality or am I just upset a girl I asked out was a lesbian? Things like that are good mental exercises to help solidify your worldview & make sure you believe in things for the right reasons.

A major reason is that resentment makes you look like a loser, and an easy target. Most leftist 'memes' they post targeted towards RWers exploit this. "Erm I can't get a girlfriend because of the joos!" It's an obvious ad hominem & straw man, but logical fallacies are illusory & only matter in a good faith debate between individuals who respect each other. For the other 99.9% of people, they are entirely meaningless.

Unfortunately, these lefty posts aren't always wrong. Despite any intellectualism you, my beloved reader, may have, there's a lot of losers who adopt the movement out of resentment instead of legitimate reasons. These losers then broadcast their failures online in the form of poorly formatted iFunny text posts & 4Chan greentexts.

Quick tangent, stop broadcasting your failures online. Especially if you use your platform to promote something bigger than yourself like an ideology or something. You're undermining everything you say because you're showing everyone you're a loser. Some people are simply far too honest online for their own good.

Outside of personal Instagram or Xwitter accounts, the ones that aren't anonymous & you use to keep up with IRL friends/family, your internet presence is a persona. Some longtime friends will likely recognize that I behave very differently on here than iFunny or Discord, and a few will know that I behave radically different in person than online. During my younger days when I had more time to spend on the internet, I would have multiple accounts with entirely different aesthetics & purposes.

It's not that your internet presence should be a lie, but it is ultimately an aspect of yourself that takes the form of whatever platform & subculture you're a part of. The way your internet friends conceptualize you is likely radically different than how your real friends do. Not that either is inherently false, but simply makes certain aspects of your overall self take precedence.

That being said, don't make your online perception of yourself look like a faggot. If you can't muster up the strength to ask out your crush for 8 years & have a breakdown because some jeet did, get over it & don't post about it. As previously stated, it undermines basically everything you say. No one wants to listen to a loser, and even those that agree with you will want to dissociate.

Women do this a lot because they have some biological drive to talk about their feelings & share experiences. This is why they have a tendency to "post their Ls." Men should not because I promise no one cares, kill yourself or improve.

If you feel the need to get something of your chest, do it with friends who actually care or under a separate account. Otherwise you're just giving your enemies ammo to use against you & more importantly against your collectives.

To conclude, you should be constantly attacking yourself in order to better solidify & strengthen your worldview. Mental version of going to the gym to get stronger. If you find out that you hold certain views for shaky or stupid reasons, you should probably consider rationalizing or just abandoning them.

There's no shame in this, it's going to make you stronger overall & alleviate any cognitive dissonance, which people are often far better at sensing than you might think.

Also, don't be a loser. Be fit, practice asking out women irl (this will put you ahead of over 50% men btw), get money, educate yourself, etc. If you can't do this sort of stuff, you probably don't belong in any RW community due to sheer lack of will. Improve.

Hail Victory.

Resentment was an important ingredient in articulating my worldview. The resentment of getting rejected over and over in middle school led me to question what I was told about relationships up to that point. I no longer hold that resentment, but I wouldn't have taken that first step without it. I could say the same thing about White Identitarianism, I wouldn't be where I am today without first resenting White guilt. I agree with you though, resentment should never play a role in your worldview beyond that point. If it is, you are either wrong or missing the bigger picture.
